WE have already seen that many animals make use of saliva in their building operations in order to bind the materials together and give strength and solidity to the whole structure. It is employed by mason bees to make cement from dust; wasps utilize it in forming the paper of which their nests are composed; many birds when building glue together shreds of vegetable substances by the same means, and it adds to the hardness and coherence of the mud and clay of the swallow's nest. It appears also in the form of silken threads, of which caterpillars make such BIRDS-NEST SOUP ingenious use in a variety of ways. But the most striking instance of all is furnished by the "Edible Swifts...
