Logic. It appears to him, that there are many persons who would decline the perusal of a treatise on Apprehension, the Divisions of Nouns, and the different sorts of Predicables, who might be interested in examining the nature of Propositions, and the principle on which an Inference is conclusively drawn. He is confirmed in this opinion, by having often observed, that youths of an ingenious and intellectual turn, disinclined as they might be to undertake the perusal of a bulky volume upon Logic, are generally gratified when an argument is set before them, in the brief and lucid form of a
